In Veldmark, honey is part of everyday life. So it is no surprise that a sharp rise in the price of honey has caused alarm across the country. A looming honey shortage has worried shoppers so much that the government held an emergency meeting to 19 the problem. Some bakers have even threatened to stop using honey in their cakes.

What is the honey shortage?

Honey prices rose 12 percent in May and 12.5 percent in June, according to the Veldmark Farm Bureau. That is about 20 the rise in the overall price index, which grew only a little over 6 percent. Farmers say that harvests were much smaller than usual, 21 a cold and wet spring that kept the bees indoors for weeks.

For now, the government is taking a wait-and-see approach, hoping that supplies will recover 22 the summer goes on.

Will the shortage reach neighboring Tarnia?

Probably, but not to the same extent. Honey is a much smaller part of the diet there, 23 the average Tarnian eating only about two jars a year.

Many people say their best ideas arrive while they are walking. A research team at the Lindqvist Institute set out to test whether this is more than a feeling. In their study, 60 volunteers were asked to think of as many unusual uses for an everyday object, such as a brick, as they could in three minutes. The number of ideas each person produced served as a measure of creativity.

Does walking help?

Half of the volunteers then walked for fifteen minutes along a tree-lined path, while the other half sat quietly in a windowless room. Afterward, everyone took a second, similar test. Those who had walked produced about 30 percent more ideas than before, whereas the seated group improved by only 4 percent.

To find out whether the pleasant scenery was responsible, a third group walked on a treadmill facing a blank wall. This group also improved, by about 26 percent. "The path was lovely, but a dull wall worked almost as well,"said lead author Dr. Anika Rowe. "It seems to be the movement itself that matters."

The team also asked participants how relaxed they felt. Feeling relaxed was not linked to better scores; some of the most relaxed volunteers actually did poorly. Dr. Rowe said that the reason is not yet clear, but the steady rhythm of walking may allow the mind to wander freely.

Limits of the study

The researchers admit that their study has limits. All of the participants were university students under 25, and the test lasted only a few minutes, so it is unknown whether the effect holds for older adults or for longer, more complex projects.

24 In the study, creativity was measured by

① how relaxed the volunteers felt.
② the time needed to finish a puzzle.
③ the quality of drawings made by the volunteers.
④ the number of unusual ideas produced in a short time.

25 The treadmill group was included in order to show that

① indoor exercise is harmful.
② pleasant scenery was not the main cause of the improvement.
③ fresh air was the main cause of the improvement.
④ walking speed was the key factor.

26 The researchers found that higher creativity scores were

① closely related to how relaxed people felt.
② related to the pleasantness of the scenery.
③ seen even when people walked indoors.
④ seen only in people who sat quietly.

27 Dr. Rowe suggests that

① walking makes people feel relaxed.
② the steady rhythm of walking may let the mind wander.
③ sitting in a windowless room improves ideas.
④ treadmills are better than outdoor paths.

28 One limitation of the study is that

① the participants were all young university students.
② the creativity test lasted too long.
③ no group sat still.
④ the walk was shorter than the test.
